

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, WEDNESDAY MORNING, MARCH 19, 1947

Tribune Centennial Photo

MEMORY TEST

Floating Logs In Early Utah

There've been some changes made! In the late seventies and early eighties, poles were in demand. The accompanying picture shows a river full of them. Ultimately they found their way to Salt Lake City streets, buildings.

Years later they were removed from the streets. They gave way to steel or underground utility connections. The river scene is unfamiliar in these days. Doubtful if you could find its counterpart anywhere in Utah.

The photograph was taken at the Provo river bridge. Loggers used to float timber to this point from as far up as Soapstone. Even the real oldtimers can hardly remember this, although they might have heard about it.

The photo was submitted by Mrs. Boyd Jones, 1748, West Second North, Provo, Utah.